Dear Wall Street Journal corrections staff:

The article attached, authored by reporter Ellen Gamerman and dated December 6 2025, omits multiple provable facts and, additionally, unfortunately, is false.

Eline Van Der Velden, a former comedian, did not create the first AI actress or actor. Heather Ferreira, a Warner Bros-associated film director, motion picture cinematography and lighting generation guidance consultant to Stability AI's Video Research Team - Sanwal Yousaf (Solutions Engineer), Agneet Chatterjee, Varun Jampani, and Rahim Entezari - during February and March of 2025, and founder and CEO of AI cinema laboratory El Camino Unreal Studios, LLC, was the first.

Evidence is attached, along with supporting links seen immediately below - a small selection of many - that also prove the assertions herein. We can also submit to you or to any digital forensics lab of your choice the complete cache of metadata proving our assertions.

Benjamin Nathan Bell, my and my team's creation, in September of 2024:

<https://youtu.be/IAqqTuPRgHU>

And in January of 2025:

<https://youtu.be/0nOAlYdt478>

The Gamerman article states Eline Van Der Velden created Tilly Norwood on February 9, 2025. That's possibly factual. Perhaps she did.

However, the article both states and implies that Van Der Velden was the first to create an AI Hollywood motion picture and television actor, and presents February 9, 2025 as the date this first occurred. This claim was published and has circulated worldwide as fact.

As you can see from above and attached evidence, these published claims made by Gamerman and Van Der Velden are categorically false and, worse, the article omits us entirely from our own prior and actual achievement, to which Eline Van Der Velden was not ever and is not a party.

Eline Van Der Velden has never worked for me, and I have neither met her, nor do I know her. Therefore any implication or insinuation she was the first to do what our company and I did first and alone without her involvement is categorically untrue.

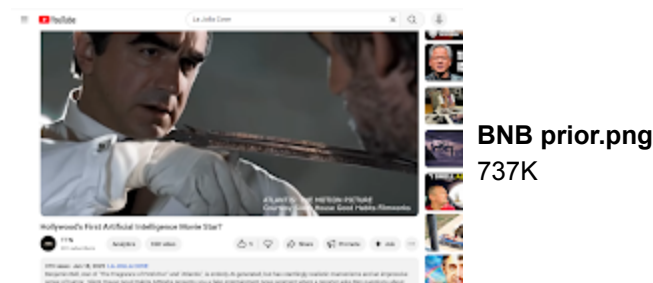

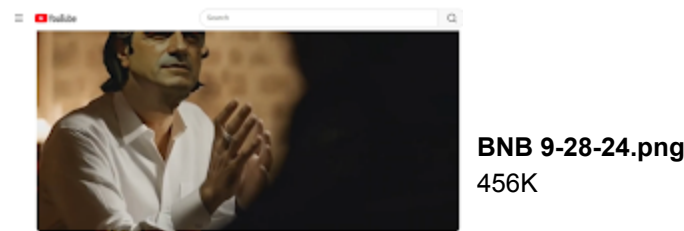

We respectfully ask that the Wall Street Journal correct the record or pull the article in question.

Thank You,
Sincerely,
Heather Ferreira,

Ms. Ferreira,

Thank you for writing. The Wall Street Journal has considered your request to alter the Dec. 6 article, and we respectfully decline to do so.

The article describes Eline Van der Velden’s desire to “make the first AI movie star,” not simply the first actress. And later the article says, “Van der Velden wanted a commercially available actress who looked like a real person.”

We don't think that the article conflicts with any of the claims you make about your work, and we stand by the article as published.

Sincerely,

Judi Walsh

CORRESPONDENCE & CORRECTIONS EDITOR

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL.

Dear Judi, this is actually helpful, and I'd like you and the WSJ to keep the article live, because it provided and provides my attorneys clear evidence Van Der Velden's creation of Tilly Norwood on February 9, 2025, was well after my creation of Benjamin Nathan Bell on MARCH 21, 2023.

Thus, thank you so much for the above decision. Please keep the article up and live, and do not spoliage or alter it, nor take it down.
